

Dr. Keisha Jefferies is an African Nova Scotian registered nurse and a health outcomes scientist at Nova Scotia Health. Dr. Jefferies' research interests include Black populations health, nursing leadership, and examining anti-Black racism in nursing education and practice. Dr. Jefferies is currently developing a program of research, MBRACe – a multidisciplinary Black research and advocacy centre, where she will generate high-quality evidence, develop evidence-informed initiatives and support the future generation of critical nurse leaders.

Dr. Danielle McCamey, DNP, CRNP, ACNP-BC, FCCP is an expert critical care advanced practice clinician with nearly 20 years of nursing experience. Currently, she is the assistant dean for clinical practice and relationships and assistant professor at the Johns Hopkins School of Nursing. Dr. McCamey is a true visionary and thought leader who is the founder, chief executive officer and president of DNPs of Color, Inc., a non-profit national (United States) organization that builds community and creates opportunities for nurses of colour through networking, mentorship and advocacy to increase diversity in doctoral studies, clinical practice and leadership.